As the investigation progressed, it became clear that the Trump campaign had, in fact, directed communication with Russia. In a statement, the Virginia State Board of Elections said it was confident that its investigation had exonerated Trump, and that the federal probe was the "subject of active investigation" by special counsel Robert Mueller. But the board's conclusion, which it has refused to release publicly, was based on the testimonies of only two individuals: Jill York, a longtime friend of Trump's campaign manager Paul Manafort, and longtime Trump friend Roger Stone. Neither of these people have been charged with any crimes, and both have a history of making baseless and inaccurate statements. As it turns out, the board may have had the help of an accomplice: the Trump administration, which has been pressuring state elections officials to give Trump a clean bill of health in their investigations of the election's influence. On Friday, multiple sources told VICE News that the Justice Department was involved in assisting the investigation, even though the board is an independent entity, and even though the public record does not support this claim. Frederick Hill, a spokesman for the board, said the board has "not been asked by the Department of Justice to investigate the election." The Virginia State Board of Elections probe is an important one, considering the content of the materials in question. They contained details of a controversial Trump Tower meeting that was set up by Donald Trump Jr. shortly after he was promised compromising information on Clinton. The emails, which came from Trump Jr.'s brother-in-law, Jared Kushner, and the chairman of the Trump campaign, Paul Manafort, showed that the Trump team was actively seeking Russian help to damage Clinton's campaign. Manafort resigned from the campaign in 82157476af
