The present invention generally relates to a battery load detector, and particularly to a battery load detector for detecting the battery discharge condition of a battery mounted on a vehicle or the like. The battery discharge condition of the battery mounted on a vehicle, for example, is detected to control the operation of certain component parts of the vehicle such as the engine and thereby the vehicle is driven. Specifically, as disclosed in Japanese Patent Laid-Open Publication No. 2-90118, the voltage of the battery is compared with a reference value in order to detect the battery load condition, and the detected load is stored so as to execute judgment based on the stored value. In the disclosed arrangement, the reference value is determined in accordance with the degree of the battery discharge depending upon the operation of the engine. The inventors of the present invention have found that there is a need to reliably detect the battery load condition with a good timing. In the arrangement where the reference value is determined in accordance with the battery discharge condition, as disclosed in the Laid-Open Publication, the reference value may not be determined with a good timing even if the value of the battery discharge is accurately known. If the reference value is too low, the battery load condition will be determined in error to cause the engine to be controlled in a manner which does not optimally control the engine.
